

DEDICATED TO HELPING SCHOOLS SUPPORT THEIR STUDENTS THROUGH CRISIS AND LOSS

The work of the National Center for School Crisis and Bereavement (NCSCB) has become increasingly important, as concerns about school shootings, large-scale natural disasters, and public health crises are increasing in the U.S. Crisis and loss can have unforeseen, lasting psychological, emotional, academic and developmental effects on the well-being of children. Classroom educators and other school professionals are well-positioned, but too often are unprepared, to support students and promote long-term recovery and resilience. The NCSCB is here to help.

Our vision is a nation of resilient schools, prepared to appropriately respond to and support their students in times of crisis and loss.

The Center's services include:

Crisis Response

Free, immediate technical assistance as well as training to schools and communities that are responding to crises, with a focus on supporting their students in the short term and throughout long-term recovery.

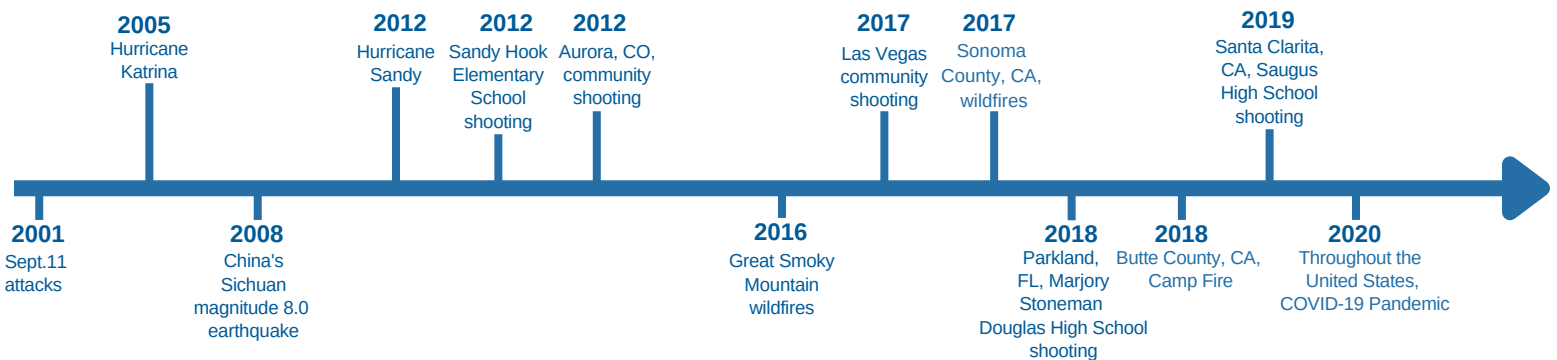

Education and Training

Free education materials, as well as expert consultation and trainings for school professionals and communities preparing for or responding to crisis events.

Advocacy and Research

Promote policies that encourage best practices in crisis response and grief support in schools, and research in the fields of childhood bereavement and disaster preparedness.

Since 1990, the NCSCB's experts have helped hundreds of schools and communities in the U.S. and abroad cope in the aftermath of tragedy, playing a vital role in fostering resilience after crisis events, including:

One of the Center's key projects is the Coalition to Support Grieving Students, supported by funding from the New York Life Foundation. The Coalition is a collaboration of over 100 major organizations representing a full range of school professionals; its website (GrievingStudents.org) offers a wide range of free training materials to empower schools to provide support to grieving students.
